Panic, chronic anxiety and burnout: doctors at breaking point

As the system piles on the pressure, who is looking after the medics?

"The psychological wellbeing of the medical workforce is being completely ignored," says occupational psychologist Caroline Eltoris.

Almost all of us become patients, sooner or later, and there is no shortage of literature about our experience of the medical profession. Our health problems have produced numerous bestsellers, many of them written by the doctors who treat us. But until now I had read little - and must confess, thought even less - about who is taking care of them.
The Role of the CMA in Physician Health and Wellness

The CMA strategy is to champion physician health and wellness leadership and advocacy; and through a lens of shared responsibility with particular emphasis on system-level initiatives. All individuals have been a major focus within the community. The health and wellness of the physician workforce is a shared responsibility and a collaborative approach, from the top-down, at the system (community), as well as the bottom-up, individual level (e.g., health and wellness).
